Religious Groups in American Politics

In American politics, religion plays a major role to voters and leaders. Voters have a tendency to favor specific political parties that are associated with a particular religion. Public laws and education in the U.S. Constitution eliminate religious prejudices and support the freedom of religion. It is hard to consider American history without relating to its religious history.

The U.S. has always been a multi-religious country. Even the first American leaders understood that unified virtues of different religions could create a successful and responsible democracy. For example, Thomas Jefferson introduced religious liberty in 1776 and acted as a Deist. When the new historic faith developed and spread in North America, the United States experienced extensive discovery, persistent revelation, and innovations characterized by liberty. Thanks to these developments, America assembled different religions from all over the world and accepted their diversity. In turn, the religious diversity changed Americans too. Catholicism and Judaism are now the ancient religions that flourish in the diverse democracy. In contrast, Islam, one of the most popular religions in the world, has almost no influence on American politics, because the Muslim population in America is only about 1%.

Religion is a key necessity in political freedom, equality, and creation of virtues. Tolerance helps fight conflicts, and knowledge beats ignorance. American society has always respected religious freedom and has been accommodating different religious beliefs in American laws. That is why American democracy has a high degree of tolerance, which is hard to find in any other country. American democracy should be accommodative of the incoming practices and teachings. Religious views are used to address democracy, since American society becomes even more diverse today.

Based on the above-mentioned facts, it is evident that religious groups have dominated American politics since the times immemorial, though sequential diversity is clear over time. American political leaders have always understood that religious democracy influences political democracy. Moreover, in American multicultural society, religion is important in making, defining, and applying policies. The values are based on the fair fact that ensures that all people treat each other with respect and dignity regardless of their religious beliefs.
