Asian Religions

Dao means the ultimate reality that reveals itself naturally, as things develop. Expected practices are courage, selflessness, and accepting the world as it is, which help people develop strength and virtues. It is a motivation for people to work tirelessly focusing more on accomplishing rather than reward. Dao-De Jing addresses major problems that a government at the right personal conduct faces. According to Dao, the best leader is strong and ensures that people live in peace. At the same time, the leader must respect other people's rights and create appropriate laws that would guarantee people's rights.

Taoism or Daoism is a form of religion practiced in China. Articles regarding the religion give different perspectives about Taoism as a religion and a practice. Regarding the information, Taoism is more of a philosophy about traditions than practical religion. The articles have portrayed it as a way to ensure that every person has a clean heart to accommodate the other. It lies in both the ancient and modernity, since its main principles are tolerance and kindness, which are the most important aspects of peaceful living and relations. Most of the features are based on traditional systems.

In the modern Shinto, it is clear that the major communication into worship is through symbols. This is clear through different objects and structures that are put in various parts of the shrine. Depending on the occasion and need, different structures are used inside the shrine, though there are some structures that remain in their positions. For example, Torii remains at the gate, and a purification trough remains on its place too. There is a main hall and an offering hall, which have some restrictions. I feel this kind of setup is important to help the followers understand, which part to visit depending on their need. The images represent the culture and traditions of the Chinese.
