Domestication of Dogs and Wolves

A dog is the most important domesticated animal. It has been helping people since long ago. Many believe that the domestication of wolves led to the evolution of dogs. This essay will look at how dogs assist human beings and how wolves became domesticated to evolved into dogs.

Dogs have proven their usefulness to humans in many ways. First, dogs provide companionship to their owners. Dogs also provide security to owner's lives and their property. Security forces use these animals during a forensic investigation and for search of explosives and drugs. People with disabilities, such as the blind, have also found dogs to be extremely helpful, as they guide them everywhere and enable them to live independent lives. Furthermore, dogs provide transport to the people in the Polar Regions. The ways dogs have helped men cannot be fully exhausted.

Wolves became domesticated through socialization with humans. Given the extremely wild nature of wolves, the socialization had to begin when the wolves were still young preferably when they were a few days old. During the socialization process, the humans regulated the wolves' diet and habits. With the passage of time, the wolves became less of a threat and became useful allies. Wolves became dogs in the course of their continued residing with humans. If the two species had stayed together, then the puppies of the wolves would have gotten closer to humans, generation after generation. In the end, wolves became dogs.
